Recommendation: Attacks on Public Figures
Overview

Issue Statement:
Our Bullying & Harassment policy provides fewer protections for public figures compared to private individuals to allow for discussion and critical commentary of people with a large public audience, like a head of state or celebrity. Because this commentary could expose public figures to harmful content that could sexualize, degrade them, or attack their appearance, we seek to add protections for public figures without censoring political or benign commentary.

Research

Key Points:

- Under U.S. law, public figures are treated differently from private individuals when it comes to defamatory speech, even if it inflicts emotional distress, due to their role in the public discourse and importance in civic life.

- However, research suggests that public figures who are women or part of a minority group receive disproportionate online abuse and harassment.

External Engagement

Key Points:

- Almost unanimous view that volume of such attacks is the most problematic aspect. No consensus on who should police it (Facebook and/or Public Figure).

- Broad acknowledgement that these attacks disproportionately target and intimidate women/minorities; our approach should acknowledge power dynamics.

- Stakeholders divided on where to draw the line; a minority call for allowing all attacks, some for removing anything unrelated to a public figure’s line of work, others suggest adopting a sexual harassment approach.
We received feedback from 79 stakeholders, including free speech advocates, human rights experts, women’s safety groups, cartoonists and satirists, as well as public figures.
